

ECOSCIENCE SCHOLARSHIP WIN

The environment and ecological science were a key focus for Year 12 student, Michael Davis, as he headed off to The University of Sydney for a prestigious International Science School in July. Michael was one of only five WA students who won a scholarship to attend the two-week long Professor Harry Messel International Science School, which involved up to 140 high school students from across Australia and around the world.

The two week long live-in residential programme which ran from July 1st to 14th, exposed participants to from renowned national and international research scientists and experts from fields related to ecoscience. Getting used to university life, tours of research facilities and hands-on activities further immersed Michael and the other students in the important issues and developments facing the world's environment.

Michael enjoyed meeting a variety of other students with similar interests, and further building his knowledge in the sciences. He also gained a feel for what university life will be like after he graduates from high school.
